

Wish with reality

with simulation because most driving on the road is incident free. By bombarding a computer with tricky scenarios over and over again in a simulated environment, it learns faster without putting anyone at risk. Musk preferred a science-fiction analogy. "If the simulation fully captured the real world, well, I mean, that will be proof that we're living in a simulation. I think. It doesn't. I wish," he said.

Economics

Musk claimed leadership in the race to create a computer that will make cars independent, saying Tesla's chips were ahead. That's bound to raise hackles at not just Nvidia but other large chipmakers working on the problem, including Intel and Qualcomm. Tesla's CEO brushed off the economics of chip-building by telling analysts that, like most chips, his are being made by someone else in an outsourcing arrangement, in this case, Samsung Electronics. But developing and designing powerful processors requires thousands of engineers and hundreds of millions of dollars. Companies like Intel and Nvidia are able to make that work because their products go into more than 200 million personal computers sold every year. Qualcomm sells chips for smartphones, a market of more than 1.4 billion units. Apple, which designs its own chips, sells tens of millions of iPhones every year. Meanwhile, Tesla delivered 63,000 cars globally in the first quarter.

Reaction

Nvidia thanked Musk for shining a light on the difficulty of the engineering task ahead of the industry and said Tesla has set a "high bar" for other automakers who will need Nvidia's help to keep up. Nvidia's stock rose Monday while Tesla's fell.

"After Tesla's boasting about results of its three-year initiative, we saw nothing tangible that would suggest Tesla could have a lead over well-established competitors," said Roth Capital Partners analyst Craig Irwin. "The company's misrepresentation of Nvidia chips, which Tesla previously used, undermined Tesla's message."

"Tesla's rejection of the technology (Lidar) as a 'fool's errand' due to the currently high additional expense is likely penny-wise but pound-foolish, especially since Lidar prices continue to drop," according to Cowen & Co analyst Jeffrey Osborne.

"It will be tough for them to make it on their own — simply put, Tesla is not a semi company so they may need to partner with someone to do it," according to Lynx Equity Strategies analysts KC Rajkumar and Jahannara Nissar. "But then again, Musk has created a car by himself so a chip is certainly possible."
